

Q&A: How 1 US Factory Owner Fought Cheap Imports

CHRISTOPHER S. RUGABER, AP Economics Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) — Much of U.S. manufacturing has been decimated in the past decade by less expensive imports from China, but it didn't necessarily have to be that way, according to a compelling new book by journalist Beth Macy.

Macy's book, "Factory Man," tells the story of one manufacturer who fought back. John Bassett III, a wealthy scion of a furniture dynasty in southwestern Virginia, responded to a flood of overseas goods by modernizing his factory and restructuring its products. More controversially, he successfully petitioned the U.S. government for protective tariffs on imported Chinese furniture, alienating many of his retailer customers. Those efforts kept his company, Vaughan-Bassett, in business.

Still, small factory towns in southwestern Virginia and North Carolina were decimated, as Macy illustrates. Forty percent of residents in Galax, Virginia qualify for food stamps. Old factory conveyor belts are now used to distribute groceries in food pantries.

Yet perhaps even more interesting is the book's vivid resurrection of the little-known history of the region, which dominated global furniture manufacturing for most of the 20th Century. That history includes intense family rivalries. Before taking on China, John Bassett was kicked out of his family's namesake company, Bassett Furniture, by an ambitious brother-in-law, who had help from Bassett's own sister.

Q&A: How 1 US Factory Owner Fought Cheap Imports

Published on Food Manufacturing (<http://www.foodmanufacturing.com>)

In an interview with The Associated Press, Macy discussed the colorful history of the Bassett family and the larger lessons of the book:

The Associated Press: What motivated you to pursue this story?

Beth Macy: In Henry County, Virginia, 19,000 people, which is half the workforce, have lost their jobs. ... First the textiles went, and then the furniture. So what happened to all these people that were left behind? What's that look like? ...When I write about economics, I write from the ground up.

AP: Your book features many unique characters, but are there larger lessons here? Could every factory owner have done more to save some of their plants, as Bassett did?

Macy: Bassett says in the book, 'Sure, we had to close some factories, especially the factories that weren't run very efficiently. But I don't think we had to close them all.'

He had to reinvent the way he did everything. He didn't just take on China, he redesigned the factory, he made it more efficient, he pumped the (tariff) duty money back in, he started a free clinic for his workers, he started worker incentives.

Everybody (else) was closing their factories. It was almost like it was the cool thing to do. There was a phrase in the furniture industry, 'The dance card is filling up.' If you don't get over there and get signed up with a factory (in China) to make your stuff, you're going to be left out in the cold.

AP: Did you expect such a Southern Gothic story, with all the family intrigue?

Q&A: How 1 US Factory Owner Fought Cheap Imports

Published on Food Manufacturing (<http://www.foodmanufacturing.com>)

Apparently a Bassett family patriarch fathered a child with an African-American maid.

Macy: That was just the worst-kept secret ever. I heard about it the first time I went there.

One of the ways I describe the book is there are two narratives. One is the narrative told by the company owners ... and the people who have money and power in the town. And the other is the narrative told by everybody else. And everybody else knows the narrative that the rich people tell, but the rich people don't necessarily know the narrative being told about them.

AP: The furniture-makers fought successfully against unions and kept wages low. You tell the story of workers who were making $6 an hour after decades in the industry. Did you ever think that these jobs weren't worth saving?

Macy: That's what the economists think. One economist I interviewed said, 'We shouldn't even be making furniture in America.' And what I say to that is, you should go interview some of these displaced workers, who would crawl on their belly like a snake to have that job back again. Because what I see, are people working part-time at Wal-Mart, and on food stamps. ... It's just so out of touch with working-class America.

Source URL (retrieved on 04/18/2015 - 11:06pm):

<http://www.foodmanufacturing.com/news/2014/08/q-how-1-us-factory-owner-fought-cheap-imports>